5. Each unit of labour is assumed to have the same productivity as each other unit of labour, which reflects the assumption that there is no discrimination between workers of different skills. 6. The production function is assumed to be homogeneous of degree one, so that the output of the economy is proportional to its input of labour. 7. The production function is assumed to be concave, so that the marginal product of labour is decreasing as more labour is employed. 8. The production function is assumed to be strictly increasing, so that the output of the economy increases as more labour is employed. 9. The production function is assumed to be continuous, so that the output of the economy can change smoothly as more labour is employed. 10. The production function is assumed to be differentiable, so that the marginal product of labour can be calculated as the derivative of output with respect to labour.
