In its early years, the organization was primarily concerned with the promotion of scientific research and the development of new technologies. It also played a role in the promotion of education and the training of young scientists. In the late 19th century, the organization began to focus more on the practical application of science, particularly in the fields of agriculture and industry. It also began to promote the use of science in the solution of social problems, such as poverty and inequality. The organization's influence grew rapidly, and it became one of the most important scientific organizations in the world.
