On the other hand, the author of the Principles does not seem to have been fully aware of the implications of his own theory. He seems to have assumed that the principles of justice are self-evident and that they do not require any argumentative proof. In this he was probably influenced by the traditional view of justice as a matter of common sense and common knowledge. He also seems to have assumed that the principles of justice are universal and apply to all human beings, regardless of their cultural or historical background. This assumption is not justified, however, because the principles of justice are not universal and do not apply to all human beings. The principles of justice are specific to certain cultures and historical periods, and they are not always consistent with the principles of justice in other cultures and historical periods.
