One thing that most parents (and most grandparents) do is reward their children with gifts or money when they do something good. This is a natural way to reinforce the behavior you want to see. However, it's important to remember that rewards can also be used to reinforce behaviors you don't want to see. For example, if your child consistently throws tantrums when you tell them no, you might give them a reward every time they do it. This would reinforce the behavior and make it more likely to happen again.
