obvious and striking features of quality are those which are common to all cultures, and which are therefore called "universal." These are the qualities which are common to all men, and which are not dependent upon the particular language or culture in which they are used. These universal qualities are of great importance in the study of language and culture, because they are common to all men, and therefore can be easily understood by any one who is interested in the study of language and culture.
The universal qualities of language and culture are the following: (1) Universality, (2) Generality, and (3) Specificity. (1) Universality means that the species for both c. c. antillarum & c. lanioides (cf. Fig. 1), we recorded no feeding, and nothing which could be definitely attributed to predation. The remains of the Thalassius larva were interpreted as being evidence of predation by Scyliorhinus, which is reported to prey on young sharks (Shandruk 1968) and to have eaten Thalassius larvae (Branstetter 1970). In addition, we found a single larva of Scyliorhinus which was too small to have been able to eat a Thalassius larva, but which contained the skeletal remains of a Thalassius larva. It is possible that Scyliorhinus had eaten a Thalassius larva and then regurgitated it.

and the other, especially after the former had been at work for some time, was but half as great as that of the latter. In our laboratory we have now made a series of experiments, so arranged that the first one of each series is always carried out with the light as it is in the sun, while the second is carried out with the light as it is in the shade. The results of these experiments show that the light of the sun is more important than shade, even though shade is often more comfortable. But as far as the temperature of the air is concerned, the shade is still more comfortable than the sun, and the greater the difference between the two, the greater is the comfort of the shade.

and second, because many people are good at writing about their church culture and get lost in the particularities of it, at the expense of trying to see what can be done to make the church more effective and more meaningful. I would like to end with a few words of my own.
First, we must be clear about what we are doing and why. Many of us have been involved in ministry for so long that we have lost sight of what it is all about. We must be clear about our mission and our purpose. We must be clear about our goals and our priorities.
We must be clear about our values and our beliefs. We must be clear about our leadership style and our approach to ministry. We must be clear about our relationship with our members and our community. We must be clear about our relationship with other churches and other organizations. We must be clear about our relationship with God.

Engaging with the community and local government is key to achieving our goals.
