In case of the removal of a segment of the intestinal wall, the remaining part of the intestine will undergo a series of changes. The first change is the enlargement of the lumen, which is followed by a thickening of the mucosal layer. This process continues until the lumen becomes too large to allow normal absorption of nutrients. The second change is the development of a fistula, which is a communication between the lumen of the intestine and the exterior. This fistula allows the passage of undigested food and waste products from the body.
